THE BOOK:

Every morning at seven, marigold opens its colourful flowers and closes them punctually at one in the afternoon. Like the beautiful medicinal plant, many other flowers have specific times for opening and closing their blooms. So what better way to tell the time than by observing a flower? The famous scientist Carl von Linné (1707–1778) was able to find out the exact time by looking out of his window at the flower clock, which he developed for the Botanical Garden in Uppsala, Sweden. This beautifully illustrated gift book explains which plants open and close their flowers at what time and how to recognize and find them. And, of course, the reader will also find instructions on how to create a flower clock in his or her own garden ...
